Attempt all the questions

1. Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

Walking has always been one of my favourite activities. To me it is the beginning of travel. The movement, the rhythm, the undulation of the senses and of the body that it initiates, I enjoy the very physical sensation of walking. When I was younger, I used to love walking on roads that were unpaved and uneven, like the paths around my Mamaghar. Some of my vivid memories involve running down the slopes behind my house.

As I grew older my adventure took on difficult shades and nuances. Walking became a more social activity. In my teens, I began walking home from school with my friends. Mostly we walked when we stayed back for some after-school activity and the buses had left, so it served as sort of minor rebellion. Staying back after school in itself made us feel grown-up. During those walks, rebels against our regimented routine, we could be free-willed masters of our time. We wanted to find our own way so we'd take shortcuts.

When I left school, my life changed drastically as I moved to Australian city Sydney. Australian streets were far quieter and organized than the cacophonous streets of Kathmandu. Yet in time, I grew to love the solitude they offered. Across the big Parramatta Road, where the buildings of my high school stood, was the completely nondescript Petersham, where I lived with my family on a street that faced the dreary backsides of shops.

Our world is so populated with brilliant and imaginative ideas, beautiful songs, things to look at, things to be in awe and to revere that we often forget that the layers of beauty we perceive in our everyday life are built on something not of our making—this earth and beyond it space, of which it is a part. The space between two footsteps makes it possible for us to move and as we walk, even when we are keeping step on with ourselves, a million others walk with us, maintaining the imperceptible relationship with space, which is governed by laws which we only have the minutest clue about.
